“Choosing a Summer Camp for Youngsters with Disabilities”

Summer's here, and it's time to make those important decisions regarding a summer camp for your child. The following information is shared in the hope that the challenges and experiences of other parents will enable you to select the summer camp that is most appropriate to meeting the needs of your child.

Although the summer presents new challenges, it also brings new opportunities. Summer means a time of freedom. It provides a chance to try new activities, seek new friendships, develop new skills. Attempting such a program during the school year often requires giving up regular school activities, and parents fear that if the child fails, he will have lost so much time he cannot enter other school programs. Summer activities do not require this risk.

While considering summer camp, understand that the decision to go to camp should be based on the total needs of the family and its members as well as those of the child with a disability. All families and all children will not find a single, universal answer. Parents must begin by defining the objectives for one's own child.

Camp Can Be A Challenge

A child in camp has to be able to be away from the family for a specified number of hours a day. He must learn to get along with unfamiliar children and adults. He must be able to participate in programs that may not be geared to his interests and abilities.

In planning for your child, you should be as clear as possible about what he will gain from a summer program. For example, a child who has only limited opportunities to be away from his family may profit from the experience of going away to camp. A child with disabilities can spend so much time during the school year mastering reading and writing that he has little energy to devote to playing with other children. The family should have a clear picture of what would be most appropriate for the child.

Should Your Child Go To Special Camp?

In some ways, all camps are special. Each one has its own unique assumptions about the best programs for children. Camp programming ranges from those directors who feel that offering the right facilities is sufficient to the other extreme of those camp directors who attempt to develop an individual program for each child. Few camps clearly reside at either of these extremes. However, it does help to identify the basic philosophy of the camp. For a child with a special problem, the camp should be committed to adapting its resources to the needs of the children.

The basic rule in camp selection is that the child is always best off in a program that presents him with a maximum challenge he can meet.

It is important, however, that he not be included in the camp merely because of good will. He should have skills or interests that will be shared by a sufficient number of other children so that he is a member of the group rather than a passive onlooker. If the camp administrators indicate a willingness to include your child in their program, they should also be asked whether there are other children who will form a natural group with him. You should also wonder whether he would be able to actively participate in enough of the program so that the camp will be enjoyable for him.

Ability to play with, enjoy, and compete with other children shapes how a youngster feels about himself. A child who feels he is inadequate finds it difficult to make friends with other children. If he is in a camp in which he cannot participate or compete at any level, it will reinforce the inadequate feelings he may have about himself.

For the child whose disability influences the major part of his life, there is a special problem of locating challenges he can master. A detailed understanding of the range of skills the child has should be the basis, not only for programming for him, but also for deciding whether he belongs in a particular camp. If the camp offers programs that utilize the skills your child has and there will be other children who can participate with him, this is the camp in which he should be enrolled.

Evaluating Camps

It is important to systematically evaluate the camp. Begin by identifying your objectives for your child as clearly as you can. A camp experience should offer a child an opportunity for a joyful, relaxed summer. It should offer a happy time for the child and for you.

Check the facilities. Each camp has its own special areas and, for some children, all these activities might be goals that should be considered, but not necessarily undertaken. The camp you select should be able to provide the special support or environment to make it possible for your child to engage in the activities.

Camp Attitudes

When you talk with the camp director, you want to understand his or her attitude toward children with disabilities. It is important that the director be interested in providing new experiences for your child. It is also crucial that camp administrators tell you how they will go about providing them.

You should be interested in the director's attitudes about your participation. Parents know a great deal about their own children. They have had a great deal of experience in understanding the special needs of their children. They have usually developed special ways of helping their children function.

A camp director who actively solicits this information believes that parents do play a crucial role. He or she has a greater chance of succeeding than the camp director who implicitly believes that parents are a burden. You should make it clear you understand no camp can reorganize itself totally to meet the needs of your child. Explain that you are also interested in helping the camp as much as you can.

Camp Personnel

The larger the staff and the more experience they have had with children with disabilities, the more likely they are to provide creative programs. Energetic counselors who are able to initiate and sustain programs should be sought out, rather than counselors who may have more experience, but have developed more limited views of what can be done.

Camp Resources

Each camp site has its problems for children. For certain disabilities, these problems are so overwhelming the child cannot function. In general, with some thought, it is usually possible to adapt the camp to your child's needs. You have a great deal of experience in the process of adapting a physical environment for the needs of your child. You have already had to do this in your home. By thinking about what special arrangements you have made for your own home, you can identify what facilities are needed for your child. You know whether there needs to be a ramp, special toilet facilities, or what can be done when they do not exist.

Often parents feel that there are so few opportunities that they should not bother to search for them. They have so often gone to so much trouble and been rejected. They do not want to go through the heartbreak again. You have to see the search process as a part of your continuous learning experience. Sometimes opportunities that did not exist a year ago exist now. Your very search itself will remind the community about how little it is doing. The interviewing process will help you re-examine the problems you face. In the process of communicating with others about your child, you will be able to review how well you understand him. You will review his likes and dislikes, the conditions under which he will attempt things and when he will not. You will be able to re-examine his ability to function in new situations and begin to see new ways of supporting him. You can review his skills and the extent to which they need to be consolidated or changed.

It is also important to prepare your child for a new camp situation. You should ask whether there are opportunities for the child to visit the camp site and meet some campers. He can learn from them what camp is really like. By talking with other parents and other children, you may get some sense of what might be necessary for your child.

Even if your child does not go to camp, the thinking that you have done will be the basis for making special arrangements for him at home. Once you have specified your goals, it is possible to enlist volunteers to help your child develop his skills. You can think about what activities you yourself should arrange for your child.

Individuals Served With: Students with ADHD, ASD, DS, and other learning and developmental disabilities who would like to improve leisure and social skills.

Sessions: Call for dates and times.
Six week block can be broken into individual weeks. Students can take half days if participating in HLC Acceleration Camp. Please call to confirm.

Capacity: 60

Fees: Call for information

Application Deadline: Call for information

Camperships: Call for information

Sponsors: None

Activities: Students and siblings of students with learning and developmental disabilities are grouped by age and functional ability with peers. Non-HLC students must be assessed before camp begins to ensure proper placement. Class placement is flexible with the ultimate goals of keeping peers together and creating the best classroom environment possible.

Dedicated daily programming covers music, art, social skills, swim lessons, gym, and daily living skills. Students also participate in weekly field trips (i.e., bowling, cupcake factory, etc.) to orient and encourage engagement with the outside community.

Staff members are trained in ABA principles and maintain a ratio of at least 1:6 for high-functioning students and 1:4 for low-functioning students.
